

Vegetable Ban Is Lifted For Holland, Belgium

By The Moscow Times

June 28, 2011

Onishchenko

The country is ending a blanket ban on vegetable imports from the European Union put in place over fears of E. coli infection, starting with the Netherlands and Belgium, the nation's top consumer rights watchdog said Tuesday.

Shipments were allowed to resume Tuesday, the agency said, following a 26-day ban intended to prevent an E. coli outbreak centered in Germany from spreading east.

Germany reported one more death in the outbreak, taking the total to at least 47, but infections have declined significantly over recent weeks.

The EU has called Russia's ban disproportionate, and the dispute has clouded Russia's talks on accession to the World Trade Organization.

The Federal Consumer Protection Service didn't say when imports of vegetables from other

EU nations will resume, but added that the Czech Republic, Denmark, Lithuania, Spain and Poland are on the waiting list.

Russia and the EU have reached agreement on safety certification, and agency chief Gennady Onishchenko said every shipment of vegetables must be accompanied by an individual certificate guaranteeing its safety.

Russia is the last major economy that isn't a member of the WTO, the international free-trade body, and accession to it is crucial to a broader partnership agreement the EU wants to establish with Russia.

Onishchenko said the Netherlands and Belgium were the first to be allowed to restart shipments because there have been no cases of infection among their residents and because Russia trusts their labs. He said both nations are only allowed to send their homegrown vegetables to Russia.

Imports from the Netherlands account for about one-third of the total EU vegetable imports to Russia, he said.

He said his agency is cautious about resuming imports from Poland because in the past it had re-exported significant amounts of food from other nations.

Onishchenko added that his agency also has no immediate plan to allow the resumption of vegetable imports from Germany.

The Robert Koch Institute, Germany's disease control center, said 47 deaths have now been reported in the country. One person has died in Sweden and officials say one death in the United States may be linked to the outbreak.

New infections have declined significantly over recent weeks but overall numbers are still rising due to delays in notification.

The disease control center says 3,901 people have been reported sick in Germany — including 838 suffering from a complication that can lead to kidney failure. A further 119 cases have been reported in 15 other countries.

The source has been traced to a sprout farm in northern Germany. It's unclear how the sprouts were contaminated.

Original url:

<https://www.themoscowtimes.com/2011/06/28/vegetable-ban-is-lifted-for-holland-belgium-a7902>