KIEV — Yulia Tymoshenko, former prime minister of Ukraine and now a leading opposition figure, pleaded not guilty Friday to abuse-of-office charges, dismissing them as politically motivated.

Prosecutors accuse Tymoshenko, who narrowly lost the 2010 presidential election to current leader Viktor Yanukovich, of illegally forcing through in 2009 a gas supply deal with Russia that Yanukovich's government called a sellout of national interests.

The case has raised concerns in the West and, in particular, in the European Union, with which Ukraine wants to sign agreements on free trade and association.

"This criminal case was made up on Yanukovich's order," Tymoshenko's web site quoted her as telling the court. "The criminal charge is something to be shamed of ... where dates and figures do not match."

The 2009 deal brokered by Tymoshenko linked the gas price to the price of oil and oil products, ending a standoff between Kiev and Moscow that briefly disrupted supplies of Russian gas to Western Europe.

Tymoshenko faces a number of other criminal charges related to her two terms as prime minister as well as earlier business activities. She has been accused, in particular, of misusing receipts from the sale of carbon emission permits.

Since Yanukovich came to power, several former members of Tymoshenko's cabinet have been prosecuted for alleged offenses in office and at least one has fled Ukraine.

Yanukovich has denied that any politics was involved and says his government is simply fighting corruption.

Tymoshenko was one of the leaders of the 2004 Orange Revolution. However, the West-leaning coalition brought to power by the revolution soon fell apart, making the government poorly prepared to deal with the global economic downturn and allowing Yanukovich to win a rematch in early 2010.
