

New Editor to Preserve Russian Esquire's 'Basic Principles'

October 10, 2011

Deputy editor-in-chief Dmitry Golubovsky has been named editor-in-chief of Russian Esquire, while television journalist Andrei Loshak will take over as editorial director, the magazine said in an e-mail to staff Monday.

The e-mail, signed by two members of the board of Sanoma Independent Media, which owns Russian Esquire and The Moscow Times, said the move was a "well-deserved promotion" for Golubovsky, who has been with the magazine for more than six years, most recently serving as deputy to outgoing editor-in-chief Filipp Bakhtin.

Golubovsky said he did not expect the magazine's independence and sometimes oppositional tone, which has made it a must-read for the intelligentsia, to change. "We're interested in doing more investigative pieces," he said.

The appointment of Loshak, a well-known, opposition-minded journalist, suggests that the magazine will maintain its willingness to butt heads with the authorities, as it did in a recent article about state-condoned kidnappings in Chechnya.

Filipp Bakhtin left the magazine last month to start a children's summer camp.

Launched in 2005, Russian Esquire has a circulation of 135,000.

Original url:

https://www.themoscowtimes.com/2011/10/10/new-editor-to-preserve-russian-esquires-basic-principle s-a10055