

Rogozin Could Head New Disaster-Warning Agency

By The Moscow Times

July 18, 2012

Dmitry Rogozin

Deputy Prime Minister Dmitry Rogozin could be tapped to head a new disaster-warning agency that will work in parallel with the Emergency Situations Ministry, a major newspaper reported Wednesday.

Rogozin, who is deputy minister in charge of defense issues, could be offered the position July 24 at the first meeting of a new public council on the military-industrial complex, Izvestia reported.

Citing the author of the idea to create the National Disaster-Warning Service, Georgy Melinetsky, the newspaper reported that the new agency would monitor the status of sites considered hazardous and extremely hazardous, and analyze and forecast both natural and man-made disasters.

Melinetsky said there are about 50,000 hazardous and 5,000 extremely hazardous natural and man-made sites, including reservoirs, power plants, bridges and hazardous-materials production sites, which would all be equipped with specialized monitoring equipment.

The cost for outfitting and monitoring the sites would be from 7 billion rubles to 70 billion rubles ($216 million to $2.16 billion), he said.

Original url:

<https://www.themoscowtimes.com/2012/07/18/rogozin-could-head-new-disaster-warning-agency-a163>