

Centuries-Old Egg Found in Azov Public Toilet

By The Moscow Times

November 13, 2012

Archeologists working in the town of Azov in southern Russia have unearthed a fully preserved chicken egg dating to the 14th century.

"The egg is approximately dated between 1330 and 1350," Andrei Maslovsky, a senior research fellow at the Azov Nature Reserve, told Interfax on Tuesday.

Peculiarly, the egg was found in a public toilet in the central part of the Rostov region town founded in 1067.

"It is mind-boggling how a chicken egg could have ended up in a toilet and was not broken," Maslovsky said.

He described the egg as being 52 millimeters long and about 39 millimeters in diameter.

He said it was very light, fragile and possibly empty because all the organic substances inside had likely decomposed and evaporated through the shell's pores.

Maslovsky suggested that the egg could be scanned by X-ray but doubted whether anything sensational would be found.

If the find turns out to be of no particular interest to scientists, it could be put on display at the Azov Nature Reserve, Maslovsky told Interfax.

Related articles:

- Construction Workers Unearth Medieval Homes in Tula
- Gravel Miners Unearth Mammoth Tusk in Altai Republic
- Ancient Bones Found in Krasnodar Dolmen

Original url:

https://www.themoscowtimes.com/2012/11/13/centuries-old-egg-found-in-azov-public-toilet-a19357