

Apartment Safety Lacking

By The Moscow Times

March 18, 2013

The  Moscow Times

The majority of new apartment construction in the Moscow region does not meet Western standards for safety, health and physical security, according to a report by RDI and LiLimitless, which analyzes the degree of modern security measures being deployed in the city and the region, Interfax reported.

Residents of high-end housing are the best protected, while owners of economy-class real estate, at best, can count on having a concierge in their foyer.

Nearly all high-end buyers can count on a fenced-in territory around their building, while only 60 percent of buildings in the economy-class range have this feature. Guards patrol the territory of all expensive properties, while only 10 percent of budget buildings have this service.

Video surveillance is also a standard feature of expensive buildings, while only 38 percent of economy-class residences have this.

(MT)

Original url: <https://www.themoscowtimes.com/2013/03/18/apartment-safety-lacking-a22425>