

Russians Proud of Their History but Not Life – Poll

July 29, 2013

The  Moscow Times

Russians take pride in their history most of all, while the country's living standards remain a main cause of national embarrassment, according to a new survey by state-run pollster VTsIOM.

Eighty-five percent of those polled were proud of the country's history, according to the poll released Monday. Eleven percent took no pride in Russia's past, and 4 percent were undecided.

Other reasons Russians are proud of their nation are the achievements of the country's athletes (77 percent), arts and culture (75 percent), military power (63 percent) and scientists (60 percent).

The nation appeared split on the question of Russia's place in international affairs, with half of respondents seeing it as a thing to be proud of, 35 percent disagreeing and 15 percent having no set opinion.

Living standards, however, were no cause for ambivalence: only 14 percent were proud of the quality of life in Russia, while 80 percent felt the opposite.

The nationwide poll, held mid-June, covered 1,600 respondents and had a margin of error of 3.4 percentage points.

Original url:

<https://www.themoscowtimes.com/2013/07/29/russians-proud-of-their-history-but-not-life-poll-a26247>