This new play at the Chekhov Moscow Art Theater takes place in four discrete cubicles, each seating 40 people. John Freedman

Any story you hear is only part of a greater whole. It's an obvious fact, but one we usually forget to consider, at least in the theater. Then along comes a show like "The Tale About What We Can and What We Can't," which actually incorporates that truth into its structure.

To say this production is performed on the Small Stage of the Chekhov Moscow Art Theater is only to provide information that will get you to the right place once you have a ticket in hand. In fact, it takes place in four discrete cubicles, each seating 40 spectators, who, for most of the performance, are isolated from one another by cardboard walls. We occasionally hear unseen spectators laughing or murmuring, thus letting us know something is happening even though we don't know what it is.

I was one of those seated in the dingy office of police chief Oleg Makhmudov. As I learned towards the end of the show, others were seated in locations that looked like lounges or living rooms. All of us heard much of what was said through the flimsy walls, but none of us saw all elements of the story being played out.

Another important aspect of the hermetic environment created by designer Ksenia Peretrakhina is the claustrophobia it breeds. The ceiling is low, the walls are tight, the furnishings are cheap, the atmosphere is aggressive. Almost immediately, before anything has been said, done or seen, one gets the impression that nothing good is going to come out of whatever awaits us. A powerful, physical sense of change grips us when the walls and ceilings fall away.

Until that moment crucial scenes are delivered to all spectators in various ways. Sometimes characters gather at doorways linking all four cubicles so that some audience members see a scene from behind, while others see it straight on or from the side. Actors may run from room to room, thus allowing some of the spectators to see some of the action some of the time.

Not surprisingly, the details of the story are rather obscure.

Alexei Kravchenko plays the shady chief Makhmudov ruling over a police station riddled with corruption and fear. Some of his underlings are making moves to bolster their careers either by ingratiating themselves to him or by challenging his authority. Everyone turns a blind eye to his odd sexual shenanigans whereby he has prostitutes engage in lewd acts with his own life size puppet while he looks on from the shadows. And everyone obeys sheepishly when he brings in a misanthropic priest to bless the station's walls.

Equilibrium at the station disintegrates when one of the chief's subordinates organizes the raid of a home occupied by the chief's lover, Marina (Natalya Kudryashova). Her criminal activities, it is clear, could not have been carried out without Makhmudov's knowledge and patronage, and what ensues is a fight to the death as to who is going to control this information.

Mikhail Durnenkov wrote this compelling text on the basis of an old, unused screenplay by Pyotr Lutsik and Alexei Samoryadov, best known for their scripts for "Dyuba-Dyuba" and "Limita" in the early 1990s. In Durnenkov's hands the story, the language and the interweaving of characters and events is entirely contemporary. It has the feel of a real-life story transferred directly to the stage.

Director Marat Gatsalov, a Best Director Golden Mask winner earlier this year, once again showed why he is one of the most distinctive directors to emerge in the last five years. He turns to advantage every difficulty thrown his way by Peretrakhina's bold design.

Over the course of the performance we rarely, if ever, are drawn into the story's potential for melodrama. Instead, we are imperfect witnesses to a tale about the effect that excessive power has on people. One way or another it breaks everyone, even those who remain standing.

"The Tale About What We Can and What We Can't" is acted with impressive veracity by the entire cast, led by Kravchenko's stunning, dark Makhmudov. In a young season already marked by several major achievements, Gatsalov, Durnenkov and Peretrakhina have given us still another.
