

LDPR Bill to Make Foreigners Speak Russian at Work Littered With Mistakes

By The Moscow Times

December 13, 2013

В Федеральном законе «О государственном языке Российской Федерации», в которую данным законопроектом предлагается внести изменение, отсутствует норма, в которой было бы прописана обязанность иностранных граждан, лиц без гражданства и граждан РФ при исполнении должностных обязанностей и на рабочем месте употреблять и общаться исключительно на государственном языке или на официальных языках субъектов Российской Федерации.

В настоящее время иностранные граждане и лица без гражданства работающие в России по договору подчастую не владеют знанием русского языка, т.е. официального языка на территории которой они работают. Также они между собой в рабочее время на рабочем месте разговаривают на родном их языке. Что коренное население приводит в негодование.

Аналогичные законодательные акты на протяжении многих лет существуют в ряде европейских стран и в США. Эти страны зачиняют свою

The bill with its mistakes indicated. via The Village

The authors of a bill that would ban foreigners from speaking their native languages at work have made nearly two dozen linguistic errors in a one-page proposal submitted to the State Duma.

Two lawmakers from the Liberal Democratic Party said in an explanatory note accompanying the bill — submitted on Thursday and published on the Duma website — that foreign workers who come to Russia often don't speak Russian well enough and communicate in their native languages at work, causing "infuriation" among the native population.

The note, running a little over one page and containing 244 words, had about 20 syntactic, stylistic and punctuation errors, Lenta.ru reported Friday. Some of the sentences were completely nonsensical because of the grammatical mistakes.

The authors of the bill are lawmakers Yelena Afanasyeva, a former education minister for the Kaliningrad region, and Yan Zelinsky, a law school graduate and holder of the "Distinguished lawyer of the Omsk region" medal.

The proposed amendments to Russia's law on official language would require foreign employees to speak only Russian or the official language of the region in which they work.

The authors said the bill mirrored similar laws in Europe and the U.S. However, the U.S. has no official language at federal level. Government documents are routinely issued in several languages — including Spanish, Chinese and Russian — in a number of states with large immigrant populations.

In the mid-2000s, the Salvation Army tried to force its staff to become fluent in English, but the policy was abandoned after a federal law enforcement agency sued. A few schools and colleges, mostly in predominantly conservative southern U.S. states, also have tried banning Spanish from their campuses, prompting a flurry of civil rights lawsuits.

Original url:

<https://www.themoscowtimes.com/2013/12/13/ldpr-bill-to-make-foreigners-speak-russian-at-work-littered-with-mistakes-a30470>