Celebrity tennis star Maria Sharapova was named the world's most influential figure under 30 in the sports industry by Forbes magazine.

Sharapova topped the 30 Under 30 list of business-savvy sports figures with an income of $29 million from mid-2012 to mid-2013.

The tennis star owes most of her fortune to commercial contracts with companies such as Nike and Porsche.

Sharapova's recently launched candy line Sugarpova brought in $6 million last year, Forbes said.

Sharapova is the only Russian on the 30 Under 30 in Sports list, which is largely dominated by Americans, and is also the only athlete in the top 3.

Her runner-up is Muthu Alagappan, 23, a basketball analytic, while the third place went to lawyer Jonathan Amoon, 29, who worked on NFA and NBA disputes.

Forbes compiles annual 30 Under 30 lists in 15 categories, from finance to food and wine, marking young talents with entrepreneurial acumen who are "impatient to change the world."

The Florida-based Sharapova, currently No. 3 in WTA ranking, has won 29 singles tournaments, including four Grand Slam titles.

In 2005, she became the first Russian to rank as the world's top tennis player, according to the WTA.
