Residents of a remote Siberian town are feeling cold inside their homes because of central heating problems, a regional official said Monday.

Outside temperatures in the town of Srednekolymyska in the Sakha Republic are currently around minus 48 C. Residents say their homes get no warmer than 10 C because of the malfunctioning heating systems, the official said.

Home heating systems in urban areas in Russia are typically maintained and powered by the state, which regulates temperatures in line with the weather outside.
