

Kaliningrad Kebabs Send 64 to Hospital

March 25, 2014

A file photo of a man preparing kebabs.

Sixty-seven people are suffering from suspected salmonella poisoning after purchasing questionable kebabs from a food vendor in Kaliningrad, Russia's consumer rights watchdog has said.

Of this number, 64 people are in moderately severe condition, while three people have been placed in intensive care, watchdog Rospotrebnadzor said in a statement, Itar-Tass reported Tuesday.

The mass poisoning can be traced back to the same point of sale in Kaliningrad, where examinations of the outlet have revealed sanitary violations, high microbial contamination and the presence of E-coli in its food products.

A laboratory study has confirmed the presence of salmonella in 36 of the known cases, which were first reported March 22.

This is the second such instance of mass food poisoning in Kaliningrad this year. In January, 17 people fell ill after eating sushi rolls at a Japanese-Uzbek restaurant, of which 14 were hospitalized with a salmonella infections.

Original url:

<https://www.themoscowtimes.com/2014/03/25/kaliningrad-kebabs-send-64-to-hospital-a33307>