

Court Gives Life Sentences for Murdered Russian Journalist Anna Politkovskaya

By Allison Quinn

June 09, 2014

Defendants in the murder trial of Russian journalist and human rights activist Anna Politkovskaya, (L-R) Ibragim Makhmoudov, Lom-Ali Gaitukayev, Dzhabrail Makhmoudov, Rustam Makhmoudov and Sergei Khadzhikurbanov attend a court hearing in Moscow.

The Moscow City Court on Monday handed down life sentences to two of the five men convicted of the 2006 killing of journalist Anna Politkovskaya in a trial that, though bursting with intrigue, left many unanswered questions in its wake.

Convicted triggerman Rustam Makhmudov was sentenced to life alongside his uncle Lom-Ali Gaitukayev, who was found guilty of organizing the murder at the behest of an unknown client.

Investigators said that it was “precisely Gaitukayev who organized the group made up of the other convicts,” and that he “controlled the actions of the participants by phone,” according to a statement posted on the Investigative Committee's website.

Three other men found guilty of tracking Politkovskaya's movements on the day of her murder were also given lengthy prison terms: Ibragim and Dzhabrail Makhmudov received 12 years and 14 years, respectively, in maximum security prison. Sergei Khadzhikurbanov, a former police officer, got 20 years for his involvement.

Although the court fulfilled the prosecution's to sentence the two most culpable defendants to life, a number of questions key to the case remain unanswered.

Crucial among these is the identity of the person or group that ordered Politkovskaya's murder. Investigative Committee spokesman Vladimir Markin said after the sentencing on Monday that "exhaustive measures" had been taken to determine who ordered the killing, and that a separate case had been launched to get to the bottom of the matter.

Murad Musayev, a lawyer who represented the Makhmudov brothers throughout the trial, has been outspoken about his belief that the trial was manipulated by prosecutors and judges throughout the proceedings.

Ahead of the announcement of the verdict on May 27, he wrote on Facebook that the hearing was "just a formality: the sentence, as we all understand, was already decided long ago."

Equally baffling for many observers is the fact that the five men convicted in May were initially acquitted in 2009 before the Supreme Court ordered the case to be reopened.

Musayev wrote on Facebook that even when the suspects were acquitted in 2009, he knew they would eventually be convicted.

"Too many careers and reputations are on the line in this case," he wrote.

Despite his apparent pessimism about the case, Musayev also wrote that he intends to file an appeal on his clients' behalfs, though he made no secret that his hopes for success remain low, saying that history illustrates the futility of the situation.

The Politkovskaya case has been filled with unexpected developments and allegations of shady behind-the-scenes behavior from the start.

Politkovskaya's children, Ilya and Vera, were so unhappy with the court proceedings and with Judge Pavel Melekhin's behavior that they decided to stop attending the hearings altogether.

"We refuse to come to court, refuse to give any kind of testimony, and also refuse to acknowledge as legitimate any of Judge Melekhin's actions in the consideration of this criminal case," they said in a statement last July.

Politkovskaya was an investigative journalist who covered stories for the opposition-minded Novaya Gazeta that many other journalists in Russia steered clear of. Corruption and human rights abuses by Russian forces in Chechnya were her fortes.

A sixth defendant in the case, former police officer Dmitry Pavlyuchenkov, was sentenced to 11 years in prison last year for his involvement in the case.

See also:

Prosecutors Want Life Terms for Murder Russian Journalist Politkovskaya

Contact the author at a.quinn@imedia.ru

Original url:

<https://www.themoscowtimes.com/2014/06/09/court-gives-life-sentences-for-murdered-russian-journalist-anna-politkovskaya-a36283>