

Russia's Central Bank Predicts Crashing Oil Prices Will Bounce Back

By The Moscow Times

September 16, 2014

The price of oil has been plummeting in recent weeks, heaping extra pressure on the already falling ruble.

The Russian Central Bank sees crude oil prices returning to above $100 per barrel in coming quarters and staying above that mark in 2016-2017, according to the bank's quarterly monetary policy document published Tuesday.

By supporting the ruble, a recovery in oil prices would help the bank reduce high inflation, providing context for its decision last week to hold interest rates despite inflation overshooting the bank's target.

However, the bank also expressed concerns that inflationary expectations among the population are deteriorating — a factor that is likely to prevent it easing monetary policy soon.

"The Bank of Russia expects that the price of oil for Urals blend will return in coming quarters to above $100 per barrel, taking under consideration the continuation of geopolitical risks in the Middle East and Ukraine," the Central Bank said in the document.

On Tuesday, Urals, Russia's main blend, traded at $95.22 per barrel, contributing to the ruble's weakening to fresh historic lows against the dollar.

The Central Bank expects the price to recover to about $102-$103 in 2016-2017.

On the downside, the bank said that expectations for inflation 12 months from now had "increased significantly" — implying that the bank still has work to do to convince the population that its anti-inflation rhetoric is serious.

In a monthly survey, 60 percent of people expected consumer prices to be rising at the current level in a year's time while more than 20 percent expected inflation to be higher, the bank said.

In early September annual inflation was 7.7 percent, overshooting most forecasts from earlier this year, mostly due to weakening of the ruble and introductions of a food imports ban by Moscow in response to Western sanctions.

The bank aims to reduce inflation to 4.5 percent in 2015 and 4 percent in 2016 — a goal which it says is consistent with the current stance of monetary policy.

Capital Outflows

The Central Bank said Russia is likely to see net capital outflows of $20 billion in the second half of the year and a total $90 billion in the whole of 2014, implying a moderation of the large outflows seen as the Ukraine crisis escalated earlier this year.

Lower capital outflows would also help support the ruble. The bank said there was a risk these outflows could pick up again if the external economic environment deteriorates, however, leading to a weaker ruble.

Under its base scenario the bank sees the current account surplus at about 2 percent of gross domestic product this year and 1 percent in 2015-2017.

It projected economic growth of 1 percent next year, rising to 1.8 to 2.0 percent in 2016 and 2.2 to 2.5 percent in 2017.

It said a sustained fall in the oil price was one of the basic risks to its base forecasts, while a prolongation of Western financial sanctions imposed over its role in the Ukraine crisis was another.

"In the event of a significant and sustained fall in oil prices there will probably be, on the one hand, a faster weakening of the ruble and, on the other hand, a significant slowing in the economic growth rate," it said.

"The reaction of the Bank of Russia in such a situation will be directed at preserving price stability and will be determined by the expected influence of the indicated factors on the rate of price increases."

Original url:

<https://www.themoscowtimes.com/2014/09/16/russias-central-bank-predicts-crashing-oil-prices-will-bounce-back-a39471>