

Yakunin Says Traditional Russian Values Need Protection From Gay Activism

March 07, 2015

Activists painted the pedestrian pavement in front of the Russian Embassy in Finland with rainbow colors to protest Russian's anti-LGBT sentimentality and legislation.

Traditional family values need to be supported against activism by the gay minority, and the idea that gays were suppressed in Russia was "a trick," a close ally of Russian President Vladimir Putin said Friday.

"We should not rape nature because of ideological, political or individual preferences," said Russian Railways boss Vladimir Yakunin, who was hosting a conference in Geneva to promote his foundation, the Endowment for St Andrew the First Called.

A brochure from the conference, on the "sanctity of motherhood," called for "socially responsible media" to resist attempts to redefine the family, which it said were "an irresponsible manipulation of the most profound parts of the human nature."

Asked if he was afraid of gays or of an open debate about gay marriage, Yakunin drew applause and shouts of "bravo" from the audience with his response.

"Practically, if you will show me the man who gave birth to a child, then the question is obsolete," he said.

Supporting families had nothing to do with oppression of gay minorities, he said, but was a reaction to activists who cross the line from personal life into political and social activism.

"We all know that in political life it is not the majority that is actually creating regimes and states and rule them," he said. "Through the history of mankind, we know that active minorities were actually the rulers of the systems."

"It is extremely important to point out that it is just a trick to say that gays are suppressed — it is not true. It is just not true."

Asked if his support for "socially responsible media" meant that the French newspaper Charlie Hebdo should not have printed satirical cartoons of the Prophet Mohammad, Yakunin noted that Charlie Hebdo had also printed cartoons satirizing Orthodox Christianity, which he said was "bad culture".

"And of course when people rushed to the street, they were against the killing, they were protesting against terrorism, but they were maybe not supportive of everything that was published."

He did not comment on the many people who had brandished the "Je suis Charlie" slogan in solidarity after the violence in January, which began when two Islamist gunmen burst into Charlie Hebdo's Paris offices.

"My opinion is no action can be answered with the killing of a person, full stop," Yakunin said.

Original url:

<https://www.themoscowtimes.com/2015/03/07/yakunin-says-traditional-russian-values-need-protection-from-gay-activism-a44554>