

Weak Ruble Takes Bite Out of Cookie Imports to Russia

By The Moscow Times

June 02, 2015

Russians consumed a total of 1.61 million tons of sweet baked goods last year, according to data from Rosstat.

Russian imports of cookies and other sweet baked goods fell 67 percent in the first four months of this year compared to the same period in 2014, as ruble devaluation and sliding wages forced many to buy cheaper domestic brands, a report said Tuesday.

Sugary baked goods imports fell to just 5,900 tons between January and April, compared to 18,200 tons during the same period last year, according to market analysts at the Center for Confectionary Market Research. The market value of the imports, which include cookies, cakes, waffles and other products, dropped from $49.6 million to $18.6 million.

The crumbling cookies market is due to "the faster price growth on imported baked goods thanks to ruble devaluation and in general, the reduction of [Russians'] purchasing power," the center's CEO Yelizaveta Nikitina said in a press release.

The ruble has fallen by nearly 40 percent to the U.S. dollar since the start of last year as low oil prices and Western sanctions over the Ukraine crisis depress economic growth. The economy is expected to contract by around 3 percent this year.

The ruble devaluation has spurred inflation and caused a sharp decline in real wages, which fell 13.2 percent in April year-on-year, the steepest monthly fall since 1999, according to state statistics agency Rosstat.

Expensive foreign products, however, aren't stopping notoriously sweet-toothed Russians from getting their cookie fix. As prices rose, the Center for Confectionary Market Research said that many Russians were switching to cheaper, domestically made brands.

Russians consumed a total of 1.61 million tons of sweet baked goods last year, according to data from Rosstat.

Original url:

<https://www.themoscowtimes.com/2015/06/02/weak-ruble-takes-bite-out-of-cookie-imports-to-russia-a47069>