

Russia's Central Bank Proposes Building Vegetable Warehouses to Fight Food Inflation

By The Moscow Times

June 10, 2015

High inflation has been driven in part by high food prices, which rose sharply following Russia's ban on select U.S and EU food products.

Russia's Central Bank has proposed using private pension funds to build 200 vegetable storage warehouses in order to battle high inflation and boost domestic agriculture, news agency TASS reported Wednesday, citing a top bank official.

The initiative is part of a broader Central Bank plan submitted to the State Duma at the end of May proposing that Russia's private pension funds be used to improve agricultural infrastructure, Sergei Shvetsov, first deputy chairman at the Central Bank, told TASS.

According to Shvetsov, the investment strategy will help reduce the Russian economy's dependence on foreign markets and slow down inflation, which stood at 15.8 percent in May compared with the same month last year, according to data from state statistics service Rosstat.

High inflation has been driven in part by high food prices, which rose sharply following Russia's ban on select U.S and EU food products in August last year in response to Western sanctions over the Ukraine crisis.

The National Association of Nongovernmental Pension Funds, a self-regulatory professional association of members of the Russian pension market, has voiced support for the Central Bank's initiative.

"Under the conditions of food embargo, the demand for domestic products is even higher than usual," Valery Vinogradov, the adviser to the president of the fund association, told TASS.

Under Russia's pension system, companies pay 16 percent of an employee's income into a state pension fund, from which 6 percent is then diverted into private funds if the employee requests it. In 2014 Russia froze contributions into the private funds during an overhaul of the system.

Shortly thereafter, Russia began to use the funds to pay for the annexation of Crimea and develop the economy as Western sanctions and low oil prices strangled investment and squeezed the state budget.

Original url:

<https://www.themoscowtimes.com/2015/06/10/russias-central-bank-proposes-building-vegetable-ware-houses-to-fight-food-inflation-a47303>