

Russian Government Presents Rosneft Privatization Guidelines

July 15, 2016

The government is selling 19.5 percent of Rosneft's total shares, and hopes to make at least ₹700 billion rubles ($11 billion). This is part of Russia's largest privatization scheme since the 1990s, with the Russian government reluctantly selling assets during a deep economic recession.

Purchasers of ■Rosneft's private stake will be subject to several requirements. ■First, any share package purchased must be held for at least three years, ■to prevent short-term investing.

Second, investors will be required to sign a shareholder's agreement that obliges them to vote in favor of any government member who applies for a seat on Rosneft's board of ## directors.

Third, an investor is required to be free of debt and with a clean record of corruption. If potential investors hold debt, they must present a plan for debt consolidation.

A preliminary list⊠of candidates for purchase of the shares must be submitted to the ⋈government by Sept. 1. The successful privatization of oil assets ⋈is not guaranteed, and if the price of crude oil climbs, analysts say ⋈prospects of sale are dim.

The first sale of Russia's new privatization campaign was concluded this week when a 10.9 percent stake in the world's largest diamond miner, Alrosa, was sold for 52.2 billion rubles ($816 million). The shares went for 65 rubles ($1.01) each.

Under President Vladimir⊠Putin, the Russian government's stake in the economy has increased⊠dramatically, to as high as 55 percent in 2015. When asked why the state is looking to sell assets, Putin replied: "We need the⊠money."
