First Russian Charged Under Controversial Anti-Missionary Law

August 11, 2016

A Krishnaite in ⊠southern Russia's Cherkessk has been charged under the "Yarovaya Law" for handing out religious ⊠books on the street, the SOVA Center for Information and Analysis reported Thursday. ⊠This is the first time that charges have been pressed under the ⊠anti-missionary part of the controversial law.⊠

At the end of July a⊠ local man informed the Interior Ministry in Cherkessk of a Krishnaite ⊠activist who engaged in conversation with two people on the street about⊠ his beliefs and gave them some religious books.

As a result, ⊠administrative action has been brought against the Krishnaite. He is ⊠accused of infringing the Code of the Russian Federation on ⊠Administrative Offenses in relation to religious associations and the ⊠freedom of worship.

The defendant has no affiliation to religious ⊠organizations and maintains he did not try to talk other people into ⊠joining one. Nevertheless, a representative from the Center for Combating ⊠Extremism said in court that the Krishnaite violated the Religious ⊠Associations and Freedom of Conscience Law.

According to recent amendments to anti-terror laws authored by ultraconservative Duma Deputy Irina Yarovaya ⊠and Senator Viktor Ozerov, the law restricts missionary activities to ⊠premises occupied by religious organizations.
