

Weekend in Moscow: Three Cheers for Oktoberfest

It may be cold, grey and miserable outside, but this weekend's Oktoberfest gives you the perfect excuse to gather a group of friends, raise a Maß (a liter of beer) and tuck into some hearty Bavarian fare — lederhosen optional. While Moscow is no Munich, there are still plenty of places you can get in the festive spirit.

Gambrinus

Music, feasting and the clinking of tankards ☒☒

Gambrinus is a legendary beer hero thought to have originated some time ☒in the 13th century — although the history books are a little uncertain.☒ The icon of beer, brewing and joviality also gives his name to a Czech ☒brew and a popular Moscow beer hall with several locations across the ☒city. While Gambrinus is the kind of place that essentially celebrates

☒ Oktoberfest all year long, this weekend the beer-themed celebrations will be ☒ in overdrive. Guests at the Park Kultury and Ploshchad Ilich branches ☒ can enjoy live music from “Bavaria Disco” — we promise you that's the real ☒ name — and if you book a table for four or more people in advance you'll ☒ be treated to three liters of free beer. The kitchen serves up your ☒ ubiquitous beer hall fare — heavy on the meat, pretzels and grenki. ☒ ☒

The German Embassy

Brews, bratwurst and a makeshift beer hall

In honor of the 500th anniversary of the Reinheitsgebot — that's the German Beer Purity Law to you and me — the German-Russian Chamber of Commerce and the German Embassy are throwing a Bavarian bash at their residence near the Mosfilm film studios. While Friday is already sold out, there are still a few tickets available for family day on Saturday. Alongside some pils-fueled mingling in the on-site Bavarian beer tents, visitors will be treated to an authentic Bavarian brass band, various games and activities for kids and perhaps even a good-natured Schuhplattler if things get lively toward the evening. Tickets are a little pricey at 4,500 rubles for an adult — which includes two liters of beer and a three-course meal — but if you're looking to celebrate Oktoberfest with actual Germans, this is the place to do it. Traditional dress is encouraged, so dig out that dirndl.

Paulaner Brauhaus

Raise a stein

For those reticent about splashing out on a ticket to a big event but still in the mood to celebrate this weekend, look no further than Paulaner Brauhaus. Moscow's favorite Bavarian-themed beer hall actually celebrates Oktoberfest in October — rather than pushing the festivities forward for the good weather and additional celebration time as is popular elsewhere. But with its wooden beams, long tables and dirndl-donning waitstaff it's probably the closest you'll get to Bavaria in central Moscow. Reassuringly you can order beer in a liter at a time — you may wish to as it has a tendency to get busy in the evenings. Pair your brew of choice with a hearty Bavarian sausage from their grill (640 rubles) or a traditional pork schnitzel (1,100 rubles). During Paulaner Oktoberfest week (Oct. 8-22), there will be even more traditional dishes on the menu. Move over Munich.

Bavarius

Cheaper than an airticket to Germany

This weekend Bavarius restaurant kicks off its Oktoberfest activities with a whole host of games, lederhosen and beer-slurping frivolity. Head chef Gennady Serenikov has put together a menu based on traditional recipes to compliment the speciality brews Bavarius will be plying you with over the course of the coming weeks. Guests can sample the Hacker-Pschorr, Hofbrau, Paulaner and Spaten Oktoberfest beers — remember to consume in moderation — not to mention the many other dark and light beers served on tap all year round. Bavarius has opted for a medieval alpine hall feel to their interior. Think heavy wooden furnishings, lanterns on the walls and perhaps even the odd taxidermy-themed decoration.
