

Environmentalists Condemn Russian Bill to Extend Hunting Season

September 27, 2016

Russian environmentalists have condemned ■a new bill to extend the country's spring hunting season, the Kommersant ■newspaper reported.

Public discussion on a new bill Iformally closed on Tuesday evening.

Under Russia's current law, regional ■authorities can designate 10 days between March and June as open ■hunting season. The bill hopes to extend that time by allowing some ■regions — including Moscow — to split their hunting area into separate zones. Each zone would then be given its own 10-day open ■season.

The bill's authors also hope that an⊠extra six days will be added to let hunters shoot ducks "with⊠the use of live decoys."

Hunters have pushed for the new bill, \simeq claim that Russia's unpredictable weather often stops many trappers \simeq from using the 10-day period.

Environmentalists have condemned the ■plans as "unacceptable," claiming that they will pose a threat to ■Russia's wildlife.

"Spring hunting causes serious harm to⊠the biodiversity of a country," said Mikhail Kreyndlin from⊠Greenpeace Russia. "Thousands of rare water birds are killed every⊠year because hunters confuse them with common migratory birds," he told⊠the Kommersant newspaper. "Shooting won't just be for ten days, but⊠for three and a half months."

Russian environmentalists have come under increasing pressure in recent months, including a group ⊠ of volunteer firefighters working with Greenpeace who were attacked ⋈ by an unknown gang.

Original url:

https://www.themoscowtimes.com/2016/09/27/russian-bill-to-extend-hunting-condemned-a55503