More than two decades since the collapse of the Soviet Union, the subject of state-sponsored repression under Stalin remains a controversial topic in Russia. Yet in the midst of these contentious debates a number of interesting initiatives, exhibits and events have emerged that examine Russia's past through a critical lens. In preparation for the Day of Remembrance for Victims of Political Repression on October 30, here is our list of places you can visit to remember and reflect on the not-so-distant past.

Remembering the USSR's forced labor camps

Housed in a newly redesigned building since 2015, the Gulag History Museum is Moscow's main exhibition space and educational center devoted to the Soviet Union's sprawling network of forced labor camps. From the Great Terror (1937–38) to the birth and development of the Gulag system to the difficult reintegration of prisoners in the post-Stalin era, the museum documents decades of Soviet repression in meticulous detail. Among the highlights are interactive touch screens, video interviews with survivors and a large collection of artifacts from former camps and prisons. Admission to the museum is free on Sunday, October 30.

The House on the Embankment

The haunted residence of the Soviet intelligentsia

Just across the river from the Kremlin stands one of Moscow's largest apartment complexes with a dark past. Built between 1928–1931 to accommodate the Soviet elite, it housed hundreds of victims of Stalin's Great Terror whose tragic fate was immortalized in Yuri Trifonov's novel "The House on the Embankment." The author himself lived in the building as a child from 1931–1939 when his own father was executed at the height of Stalin's purges. For 100 rubles, visitors can peruse display cases, photo collages, book collections, and antique objects related to the building and its former residents.

Returning the Names

Honoring victims of Soviet terror

Since 2007, the International Memorial Society has organized an annual event called "The Return of the Names" on October 29 to commemorate the tens of thousands of victims of Stalin's Great Terror in Moscow. The public gathering at the Solovetsky Stone — a relic from the infamous Solovki labor camp in Russia's Far North that was installed as a memorial on Lubyanka Square in October 1990 — intends to raise public awareness about Russia's totalitarian past. This Saturday, victims' names will be read aloud from 10:00 a.m. through 10:00 p.m. and Russian and English-language walking tours of the Lubyanka neighborhood will be offered throughout the day.

A Tribute to Varlam Shalamov

The tragic life of a Gulag survivor

Few individuals encapsulate the experience of repression during Stalin's reign better than Varlam Shalamov, a Russian writer who spent nearly two decades in Soviet labor camps. This year, the International Memorial Society is hosting a special exhibit on Shalamov, whose famous collection of stories "Kolyma Tales" remains one of the most powerful literary portrayals of life and death in the Gulag. A poster exhibit on Lubyanskaya Ploshchad explores his life in Moscow and in exile. The indoor exhibit at Memorial will remain open on weekdays from 11:00 a.m through 7 p.m. until February 1, 2017.

Last Address Project

The victims return home

Walking through downtown Moscow, an attentive observer might occasionally notice small silver plaques attached to the entrances of apartment buildings. These memorials are part of the Last Address project commemorating the life and last residence of ordinary people murdered during Stalin's purges. Inspired by the brass cobblestone project in Germany that pays tribute to Holocaust victims, each plaque contains a person's name and the dates of his or her birth, arrest, execution, and rehabilitation. These plaques are part of a growing civic initiative to restore the identity of terror victims "one name, one life, one marker" at a time.

Butovo

Moscow's field of mass graves

On the southern outskirts of Moscow in the settlement of Butovo lies a memorial complex where Soviet state security (NKVD) executed and buried more than 20,000 people in unmarked mass graves. Between 1937-38, thousands of "enemies of the people," including labor camp prisoners, former tsarist officers, and members of the clergy, were murdered in this killing field during Stalin's purges. Today, only a few posters, small monuments, and two Orthodox churches mark the site where so many Soviet citizens perished. A memorial wall named the "Garden of Memory" bearing victims' names is set to open on the site in the near future.
