

November 14, 2016

On Nov. 12, the social network Vkontakte first notified users that it is now blocking access in Vkontakte told the website TJournal that it doesn't know why the community has been

A spokesperson for Roskomnadzor, Russia's federal censorship agency, told TJournal that workers' community page.

Factory employees told TJournal that they suspect the catalyst for the police action was an announcement posted in the community on Nov. 9, declaring plans for a "people's gathering."

Today, the Vkontakte group still exists, though it is accessible in Russia only through the Tor browser or Internet proxies. Community administrators have even added the words "only through the Tor browser" to the group's name. Workers have also launched a new community to replace the one banned by the government. At the time of this writing, there are 192 members in this new group. (The original group had 389 members.)

Workers are reportedly planning a public demonstration to air their dissatisfaction with the unfulfilled promises of the country's ruling political party, United Russia. In the spring, the party distributed leaflets telling factory employees that their wage arrears would be resolved promptly and new investors would be found to revitalize the region's manufacturing industry.

Today, workers say they're still owed significant back wages, and many are being forced to take leave without pay and accept renegotiated labor contracts. According to one local report, activists from United Russia and the party's youth wing, Molodaya Rossiya, tried to disrupt a protest by Krasnodar's factory workers earlier this year.

Original url:

<https://www.themoscowtimes.com/2016/11/14/russian-police-shut-down-factory-workers-online-community-for-planning-a-protest-a56134>