

Russian Anti-Doping Official Denies Admitting 'Institutional Conspiracy'

December 28, 2016

The  Moscow Times

Russian Anti-Doping Agency (RUSADA) issued a statement denying that its acting head Anna Antseliovich called doping in Russia an “institutional conspiracy” in an interview to The New York Times. The statement was published on RUSADA's website on Wednesday evening.

On Tuesday, The New York Times ran a story saying that Antseliovich called Russian athletes using performance-enhancing drugs an "institutional conspiracy," yet denied that top-rank officials took part in it.

"Russia is for the first time conceding that its officials carried out one of the biggest conspiracies in sports history: a far-reaching doping operation that implicated scores of Russian athletes, tainting not just the 2014 Winter Olympics in Sochi, but also the entire Olympic movement," the New York Times reported.

RUSADA's statement, however, maintains that Antseliovich said no such thing. “[She] made a suggestion and Richard McLaren [main investigator of the doping scandal in Russia] replaced the words 'state doping system' with 'institutional conspiracy,' thus indemnifying top-level Russian officials," the statement read. The New York Times journalist Rebecca Ruiz, it went on to say, took Antseliovich's words out of context and wrote that RUSADA admits "institutional scheme of covering up doping in Russia."

"RUSADA is not empowered to either admit or deny such a fact," read the statement. "Russia's Investigative Committee is studying this case."

Earlier on Wednesday the Kremlin spokesman Dmitry Peskov

expressed doubt about

veracity of Antseliovich's interview. "The reliability of her words must be verified. Whether it is true, whether the words attributed to Antseliovich were really said, what she meant – [all these things need to be verified] before we make any conclusions," Life quoted Peskov as saying.

Rebecca Ruiz, The New York Times journalist in question, said all the quotes in her story are accurate. "Russian officials told me they are no longer disputing the existence of doping schemes, only that those schemes were state-sponsored," Ruiz wrote on Twitter, responding to RUSADA's statement. "I asked Vitaly Smirnov, Russia's anti-doping reform chief, if this was correct. He said yes."

Original url:

<https://www.themoscowtimes.com/2016/12/28/russian-anti-doping-official-denies-admitting-institutional-conspiracy-a56682>