

Presidential Adviser Says Russia Could Be Cut Off From Internet

December 29, 2016

Pixabay / Pexels

Presidential Internet Adviser German Klimenko said that Russia could be entirely cut off from the global internet in an interview with RT Russian Service.

When asked about a new draft law from the Ministry of Communications regulating the Russian internet, Klimenko explained that it is designed as a protective measure.

"In the law we are talking about the protection of critical infrastructure, which should be located in Russian territory," Klimenko said.

"For example, hackers can penetrate the structure of commercial banks and steal money. This is bad, but if they get into the system of the Central Bank, there will be big trouble."

Klimenko also explained that the West had cut Crimea off from services like those of Microsoft and Google, which became a problem for domain owners based in the peninsula.

Related article: How Russia Raised a 'Potemkin Firewall' Against International Social Networks

"There is a high probability of tectonic shifts downward in our relations with the West. Therefore, our task is to adjust the Russian segment of the internet to protect ourselves from such scenarios."

According to Klimenko, ordinary internet users will not be affected by the law.

Original url:

<https://www.themoscowtimes.com/2016/12/29/presidential-adviser-russia-could-be-cut-off-from-internet-a56693>