

You Sunk My Battleship: Russian and British Navy Engage In High-Seas Trash-Talk

By Katie Marie Davies

January 26, 2017

Reuters

Forget frigates and aircraft carriers:Russia's armed forces have reached full-sail sass in a war of wordswith the British Navy.

British Defense Secretary Michael Fallonlaunched the first blow on Jan. 25, when he branded beleagueredRussian aircraft carrier the Admiral Kuznetsov the Kremlin's "shipof shame."

The politician promised that Royal Navyforces would be tracking the ship alongside its battlegroup as theytraveled back to base through UK waters. The battlegroup had beenstationed in the Mediterranean Sea as part of Russia's operations inSyria until Jan. 6, when the Kremlin announced that they had"completed their mission."

"We will keep a close eye on the ~~Admiral Kuznetsov~~ as it skulks back to Russia; a ship of shame whose ~~mission~~ has only extended the suffering of the Syrian people," Fallon ~~said~~.

"We are man-marking these vessels ~~every~~ step of the way around the UK as part of our steadfast ~~commitment~~ to keep Britain safe."

Related article: Putin's Great White Fleet

Not to be outdone, the Kremlin has scrambled to put together a pithy putdown of their own, blasting the British naval escort as a way of distracting British taxpayers from the "real state of the Royal Navy."

"Russian warships don't need this kind of senseless escort in the first place," Russian Defense Ministry Spokesperson Major-General Igor Konashenkov told the Interfax news agency on Thursday morning.

The Kremlin was also quick to launch a few snide remarks at Britain's nuclear submarine program, Trident. The British press claimed on Jan 23. that four unreported Trident missile test failures had taken place in 2015, with missiles flying wildly off-course.

"We'd advise Mr. Fallon to pay a little more attention to the British fleet — and according to reports in the British press, he has every reason to do so," Konashenkov said.

Related article: Russia's Flotilla Flop

The Admiral Kuznetsov reportedly entered the British Channel on Wednesday. The ship will be tracked by Type 23 Frigate HMS St. Albans alongside Royal Airforce aircraft, a British Navy spokesperson said.

The ships would remain "at a respectful distance," but British sailors would watch "every movement," the spokesperson said. "As an island nation, the security of the seas around our coastline is vital."

The British Navy spent almost £1.4 million ($1.7 million) on tracking Russian warships in 2016 as they first journeyed on their way to Syria, according to information released by regional news outlet The Portsmouth News.

The battlegroup are headed toward the Russian port of Severomorsk, a town in the Murmansk region where Russia's Northern Fleet is headquartered. The journey is expected to take 10 days.

Original url:

<https://www.themoscowtimes.com/2017/01/26/frigates-at-dawn-russia-hits-back-in-trash-talk-battle-with-the-british-navy-a56933>