

Russia Mulls Limiting Cash Payments to Combat 'Shadow Economy'

February 21, 2017

Igor Akimov / TASS

The Russian government is discussing plans to limit cash payments in a bid to combat Russia's "shadow economy."

The new measures could include a ban on salaries paid in cash, and limiting cash payments for cars, apartments and luxury goods, the Vedomosti newspaper reported Tuesday.

The plans have not yet been officially approved, but if successful could be rolled out as early as 2018, an unnamed source told the newspaper.

Related article: One in Five Russians Receiving Salary 'Off The Books' — Poll

The head of Russia's Finance Ministry Anton Siluanov urged the Russian government to limit cash payments in January 2017. He praised the Indian government, which ruled in November 2016 to demonetize high-value notes in a bid to stop citizens hoarding large amounts of money outside the banking system.

“It is a way to whitewash the economy,” he said. “We can use these methods to make the economy more transparent and to collect more taxes,” he said.

Russians made cash payments worth 8.7 trillion rubles ($150 billion) in the first nine months of 2016, while 19 trillion rubles (328 billion) was transferred using bank cards, according to data from Russia’s Central Bank.

Original url:

<https://www.themoscowtimes.com/2017/02/21/russian-government-considering-limits-on-cash-payments-a57218>