A teenage girl detained by police during Sunday's anti-corruption rallies has accused officers in the Russian city of Krasnodar of threatening her with criminal charges if she did not pose as a paid protester.

Seventeen-year-old Diana told ■Krasnodar's Yuga news site that she was pressured to sign a false ■confession admitting she'd been paid to attend the protest.

"I was told that there would be more serious consequences if I tried to resist," Diana told the news site.

"I was offered two options: if I\signed a document admitting that I was paid for participating in the \signatural rally, or if I said that I was a bystander who had been \sigma'accidentally' picked up, I would be released," she said. "Otherwise, they said I would be charged with participation \sigma in an unsanctioned rally and resisting the police."

The teenager also said that the police ■ had asked for her phone in order to delete all images from the ■ protest.

"When I went to the rally, I did not think that the police would drag young women through the mud [like they did with me.] We didn't behave aggressively, we didn't insult anyone. For me, it was another reason to go to the rally next time."

Between 300 and 1,000 people attended ■ the rally in Krasnodar, according the data from the Meduza news site. ■ Roughly 100 people were detained.

The Kremlin has already accused opposition ■politician Alexei Navalny of paying children to attend ■anti-corruption rallies held throughout Russia on Sunday. Many of the rallies took place without authorities' permission.

"We cannot respect the kind of people who knowingly mislead minors — children, in fact — with the promise of some monetary award just to make them take part in an lillegal rally," Peskov said. "[These children] are risking their safety or even their lives."

Navalny had previously promised to⊠win compensation sfor arrested protesters from the European Court of Human⊠Rights (ECtHR). In a blog post on Wednesday, the politician⊠announced that his project, the Russian Euro Court, would help⊠demonstrators "file thousands of appeals" to gain a payout from the Russian government.
