

Opposition May Benefit From 'Crisis' Hitting Russian Political Parties

July 10, 2017

Andrei Lyubimov

Russian political parties have been in a state of deepening crisis since parliamentary elections in 2016, the Committee of Civil Initiatives led by former finance minister Alexei Kudrin said on Monday.

Except for the ruling United Russia party, Russian political parties have had difficulty identifying nominees to run in elections, a copy of the committee's report obtained by the Vedomosti newspaper claimed.

"In the run-up to elections [last fall], many parties didn't hold public campaigns, except for during municipal elections in Moscow," the report said. "Some parties either folded or fell into political obscurity."

Related article: United Russia Party Sees Approval Ratings Rise

According to the report, fewer politicians are vying for State Duma seats because of mounting restrictions that come with the job, including a ban on holding foreign assets and meeting with voters outdoors.

The committee report also found that prospective candidates are reluctant to run in elections if their positions are at odds with the predominating political line represented by United Russia.

The crisis facing Russian political parties may be advantageous to opposition groups, including opposition leader Alexei Navalny, as they work to fill this political vacuum, the report added.

“After 2016, no opposition exists, with the exception of Navalny, who can now operate almost without competition outside of Moscow,” the report’s author, Alexander Kynev, wrote.

Original url:

<https://www.themoscowtimes.com/2017/07/10/opposition-benefit-crisis-political-parties-a58352>