Filmmaker Alexei Uchitel's St. Petersburg studio was attacked with Molotov cocktails in the early hours of last Thursday. Uchitel accused the authorities at the time of ignoring repeated calls to take action in response to the intimidation.

A religious vigilante group warned cinema managers early this year that "cinemas would burn" if "Mathilde" was shown. The most high-profile critic of the biopic among Orthodox activists is State Duma Deputy Natalia Poklonskaya.

Poklonskaya and Orthodox activists have described the film as offensive to religious believers.
