

Russia Restores Flights to Cairo 2 Years After Deadly Crash

January 04, 2018

Dennis Jarvis / Flickr (CC BY-SA 2.0)

President Vladimir Putin has signed a decree restoring Russian flights to the Egyptian capital, two years after flights were suspended following a deadly terrorist attack on a passenger jet bound for Russia.

MetroJet Flight 9268 crashed over the Sinai Peninsula on Oct. 31, 2015, killing all 224 people on board. Investigators later confirmed that a bomb planted in the oversize baggage compartment had downed the St. Petersburg-bound plane.

Link:

<https://themoscowtimes.com/news/investigators-confirm-sinai-plane-crash-as-terrorist-attack-reports-55308>

The decree published on Thursday exempts Cairo from the November 2015 executive order halting Russian passenger flights to Egypt.

The exemption does not affect other Egyptian cities, including Sharm el-Sheikh, the Red Sea resort from which the ill-fated jet carrying Russian tourists had departed.

Egypt was one of the top destinations for Russian tourists before the deadly terrorist attack.

Original url:

<https://www.themoscowtimes.com/2018/01/04/russia-restores-flights-to-cairo-2-years-after-deadly-crash-a60117>