Khleb Nasushny, Russia's answer to Le Pain Quotidien, is there to weaken our wills

Bread: the foundation of our civilizations, the root of our prayers. Even “mad monk” Grigory Rasputin recognized its importance, warning the tsar what could happen if the country’s supply of crucial ingredients (flour, butter, sugar) were to dwindle. The mad monk was right.

Whether practical or poetic, there's no substitute for bread, despite what dieters may say. Khleb Nasushny, Russia's answer to Le Pain Quotidien, is there to weaken the wills of those who continue to pretend.

But how many even daily consumers know the history of their sandwich staple? A group of TMT Club-goers wanted to improve this statistic.

Khleb Nasushny at 17 Tverskaya Ulitsa, not far from where Maxim Philippov's flagship bakery once stood, leads the chain's way to finding its historical roots. It pioneers the cafe's plans to resurrect the name, decor and recipes that made the legend it once was. Other branches will soon follow suit.

Back in the day, Philippov was the everyman's baker: from the tsar's family to government officials to the local plumber. Reasonable prices and quality classics, particularly the popular kalatch loaf, earned him a name for himself; his business savvy earned that name longevity.

Tenacious and enterprising, Philippov saw his company through a destructive fire and a moment of near disaster. As the story goes, an official (a regular customer) was working his way through a familiar treat: saika, a dessert bun. Finding an unwelcome ingredient within, he shrieked, "Philippov! What on earth is this doing in here?"

The baker rushed over; indeed, a cockroach had somehow been baked into the dough. Mustering his finest poker face, Philippov assured the man, "That's just a raisin! It's a new recipe, is all!" He then bit a chunk off to prove it before racing back to the kitchen to dump raisins into the remaining batter. The innovation that arose would join kalatch as one of the baker's signature recipes.

The group got to see and taste the treats as we learned about them. They found Khleb's saika lived up to the hype. A soft bun with a crunchy nut topping, the reinterpretation is an improvement on a childhood favorite (and also likely an improvement on the original).

Other favorites include Borodinsky, made in the traditional way with honey (which modern recipes tend to forget); nalivashki, similar to pie-like pirozhki in appearance, but with warm fillings of egg, cheese and green onion; and gubniki, lip-shaped and mushroom-stuffed.

Kalatch is probably more interesting to view than to eat, as it is practically indistinguishable from basic white bread — although it is elevated by the cafe's homemade jams. Everything was washed down with ginger tea and Ivan Chai (willow herb tea), both of which are also homemade.

I've long appreciated Le Pain Quotidien and Khleb Nasushny for consistently bringing an inviting atmosphere, tasteful music and international menu to cities all around the world. Philippov Bakery retains all of that, contributing to it the story of a Russian artisan — a former serf, earning his place in what was then a German-dominated craft. Russian bread hasn't been the same since.
