Russian President Vladimir Putin held his live televised annual phone-in with the Russian people on Thursday. The marathon Q&A, which started at noon local time, took 4 hours and 20 minutes.

Here are the highlights:

On the poisoning of Sergei Skripal

When asked about allegations of Russian involvement in the poisoning of ex-spy Sergei Skripal and his daughter Yulia, Putin said that Russia would like "to be given access to our citizens, to Yulia, and we would like to have the opportunity to take part fully in the investigation."

"If as Britain insists a military chemical agent was used against these people, they would have died within seconds or minutes, on the spot," he added. "Thank God, this did not happen. Clearly we are dealing with something other than a military agent."

On Western sanctions

Asked about Western sanctions, Putin said: "It is because Russia is seen as a threat, because Russia is seen as becoming a competitor. I believe this approach is mistaken. Instead of restraining whoever, it would be better to establish constructive cooperation, and then the overall effect on the global economy would be positive."

On Trump's steel tariffs

"The introduction, for example, of restrictive tariffs on steel, on aluminium, not only for Europe but also for Canada and Mexico, in essence these are also sanctions... They are related to the pragmatic national interests of the United States."

"When in 2007 I spoke in Munich, a speech that is frequently quoted nowadays... I spoke about the fact that the United States is widening the jurisdiction of its laws beyond its national borders, and that this is unacceptable. And that's exactly what's happening now, also to our European and other partners. Why is this happening? No one wanted to listen and no one did anything to stop this from developing."

On the doping scandal and Vitaly Mutko

Asked about Vitaly Mutko, who was sports minister at the time of the first allegations of Russian state-sponsored doping, and his current role as deputy prime minister, Putin joked that Mutko's notoriously poor English "needs perfecting."

"We should look at the facts, not the emotional aspects of his work," Putin said. "The Sochi Olympic sites... Mutko was involved in this. The World Cup stadiums, this was largely done by Mutko. I understand everything, but I do not make emotional judgments, my judgments are based on the facts."

"There is one other point: we know how he was attacked in connection with the doping scandal, and so on and so on. In these circumstances it's just impossible to send him into retirement. I repeat: he has a lot of potential. Let him work."

On rich Russians abroad

Asked a question about visa problems experienced by billionaire Roman Abramovich in Britain, Putin said Russian businessmen were being persecuted in countries like Britain and that they would be better off in Russia along with their assets.

"Who is going to help them abroad? They are just persecuted there. Conditions are created making their work impossible. This is a big mistake by those who are doing this in the West."

"In essence, they are sawing the branch on which they are sitting. This is counterproductive and damaging for those involved and for the global economy."

"Some say we need to help Abramovich and other Russian businessmen who have ended up in a difficult situation... I wouldn't want to speak right now about those people who have broken various laws. I am speaking about people who acquired their capital through legal means. The former and the latter are better off being in Russia."

On banning Telegram

Putin was asked by a blogger whether Russia might block Instagram and YouTube.

Putin said his primary concern was people's safety and that he was aware about the ban on Telegram. He added: "We are not going to close anything," urging a "civilized solution."

"Therefore, I'm going to urge all my colleagues to take this route, the route of ... using modern methods to combat offenses, including terrorism, without restricting freedoms, including those on the internet."

On the upcoming World Cup ...

"Even though our national team has not demonstrated strong results recently, but the number of fans of this beautiful sport here is massive, it's in the millions. We will rely on the fact that our soccer team will score a big win, so to speak, and will show its best qualities."

"I would like right now to address my colleagues in the regions, to ask them to not allow, under any circumstances, for flea markets and the like to appear at these stadiums, as appeared in other sport-related buildings in Moscow during the middle of the 1990s."

... and the danger of Ukrainian intervention during the tournament

Zakhar Prilepin, a Russian writer who advises rebels in the Russian-backed, separatist Donetsk region, asked Putin to comment during a televised call-in about the possibility of Ukraine launching military action.

"I hope that there won't be any provocations but, if it happens, I think it would have very serious consequences for Ukrainian statehood in general," Putin said.

On the prospect of a World War III

Asked whether there "is going to be a World War III," Putin laughed and cited Einstein: "I know not with what weapons World War III will be fought, but World War IV will be fought with sticks and stones."

He added: "The understanding that a third world war could be the end of civilization should restrain us from taking extreme steps on the international arena that are highly dangerous for modern civilization."

On 'defending' Russian-speakers in Latvia

Asked whether he was prepared to introduce sanctions against Latvia for reportedly infringing on the rights of Russian-speakers there, Putin said he was against such measures.

"When it comes to the position of our compatriots in the countries of the Baltic, we are constantly talking about this, bringing it to the attention of the governments of the Baltic states, including Latvia...", he said. "The measures that we take to protect the interests of our compatriots must be such that they do not actually worsen their situation."

On Syria

Putin said Russia's Armed Forces would stay in Syria for as long as it was in Russia's interest. "We are not yet planning a withdrawal of these military forces," he said, adding that Russia could leave the country quickly if necessary.

On the economy

"Overall, we are moving in the right direction. What is the basis for saying this? We have started on the trajectory towards robust economic growth in Russia. Yes, this growth is humble, small, but it is also not a fall. Growth was at 1.5 percent last year."

"Not everyone feels this personally but overall, this is an objective statistic. That's how it is, it is the truth. Export in technical equipment is growing, which shows that some structural changes are going on in the economy. Export of agricultural produce, at 20 billion last year, was higher than defense exports, which were at 15 billion."

On humor (or the lack thereof)

Overall, there were few humorous moments. Asked by the show's presenter to share a joke he recently heard, Putin used an occasion to make a stab at the West.

"Recently one of Germany's famous and popular publications wrote that President Trump is pushing Europe towards Putin. If we take this together with an earlier joke, that Russia influenced elections in the United States, then this all taken together starts sounding pretty funny. We apparently influenced the election of the U.S. President, and then he gifted us Europe. Total nonsense. There's no way to describe this other than as a joke."
