

Study Shows 17 Percent of Russian Men Won't Live to Retirement

June 27, 2018

Maxim Korotchenko / TASS

Ahead of nationwide protests this weekend against a plan to raise the pension age, a study has said that up to 17 percent of Russian men may not live to see retirement.

Prime Minister Dmitry Medvedev in mid-June announced a plan to progressively increase the pension age starting in 2019. The plan has touched a nerve among Russians and set off plans for nationwide protests organized by opposition figures and trade unions.

Related article: Reports: Newspaper Edition Seized for Covering Unpopular Pension Reform

Under the plan, by 2028, men would retire at 65, five years later than they do now, while the pension age for women would increase from 55 to 63 by 2034.

In a joint study with the Higher School of Economics' Institute of Demography, RBC reported Wednesday that up to 17.4 percent of men and 6.5 percent of women may not live to reach retirement by the time the reform is rolled out.

The study also found that as the pension age increases, the probability of surviving until retirement will steadily decrease.

For the first generation of men to be affected by the reform — those born in 1959 — 95.8 percent are projected to live to reach 61 years of age.

However, for those eligible to retire at 65, born in 1963, the number would fall to 82.6 percent.

Related article: Kremlin Shrugs Off Rare Dent in Putin's Ratings Over Retirement Age Hike

According to the study, women have a higher chance of living to retirement: 93 percent of women are projected to live to retire at age 63 when the reforms will have gone through for women by 2034.

The study combines data from the Human Mortality Database and Russia's federal statistics agency Rosstat.

Protests have been planned in dozens of cities this weekend by opposition leader Alexei Navalny, trade unions and Russia's Communist Party. The latter has announced it will push for a nationwide referendum on the issue.

Original url:

<https://www.themoscowtimes.com/2018/06/27/study-shows-17-percent-russian-men-wont-live-pension-a62023>