

Russia Braces for Weaker Ruble, Lower Growth Due to U.S. Sanctions

By Reuters

August 23, 2018

Maxim Oreshkin / Kremlin.ru

New U.S. sanctions would pressure the ruble and fuel capital outflows over the next 12 months, Russia's Economy Minister Maxim Oreshkin said on Wednesday, recognizing the need to trim the economic growth forecast.

Oreshkin became one of the first government officials to acknowledge that the latest bout of sanctions and the risk of further such measures would take a toll on Russia's economy after the Kremlin dismissed the ruble's fall to its weakest levels since 2016 as simple market volatility.

"The issue of the sanctions theme, the crisis that we see in Turkey, the ongoing problems in Argentina and Brazil, all these will clearly affect the Russian market," he told reporters.

On Wednesday, the ruble weakened towards its lowest mark in more than two years as traders priced in the risk of more U.S. sanctions and foreign currency purchases by the Russian central bank took their toll.

Related article: U.S. Lawmakers Push for More Sanctions on 'Menace' Russia

The U.S. Treasury imposed sanctions on various Russian entities on Tuesday, and a new tranche of sanctions announced by the U.S. State Department earlier this month was expected to take effect later on Wednesday.

Oreshkin said the ruble would weaken more than expected over the next 12 months, while economic growth would fall somewhat short of earlier projections.

The ministry used to expect the Russian ruble to average around 61 per dollar this year, weakening to an average of 63-64 in 2019. It now fetches 67.96 to the dollar, having shed more than 8 percent of its value so far this month.

"We are likely to revise this year's economic growth (forecast) slightly from 1.9 percent to 1.8 percent. The changes will be mostly of a cosmetic nature," Oreshkin said.

Oreshkin said foreign investors in Russian government bonds, known as OFZs, were unlikely to step up the selling after having already ditched the bonds due to threats of more U.S. sanctions.

He also said inflation in Russia was likely to exceed earlier expectations due to a worse-than-expected grain harvest and the weaker ruble.

Original url:

<https://www.themoscowtimes.com/2018/08/23/russia-braces-weaker-ruble-lower-growth-due-us-sanctions-a62631>