

U.S. Goes to WTO to Challenge Russian Response to Trump's Steel Tariffs

By Reuters

August 30, 2018

World Trade Organisation

The United States launched a complaint against Russia at the World Trade Organization (WTO) on Wednesday, challenging measures introduced by Russia in response to recent U.S. tariffs on global steel and aluminum exports.

Imposed in July, the measures in question featuring extra duties on a limited range of U.S. goods were a limited response to the U.S. tariffs, aimed at compensating for just $87.6 million of the $537.6 million Russia expects the hike to cost its companies.

The United States said Russia's measures broke WTO rules by applying only to U.S. imports, and not to goods from any other country, and because the rates of duty were higher than the maximum allowed under its WTO membership terms.

Related article: Russia Files Claim Against U.S. Steel, Aluminum Duties to WTO

Russia now has 60 days to settle the dispute, after which the United States could ask the WTO to set up a panel to adjudicate.

"The United States has incorrectly interpreted the nature of the measures taken by Russia," Russia's economy ministry said in a statement.

"We are acting within the framework of the WTO agreement on special protective measures, which allows countries to compensate for damages incurred as a result of 'special protective measures' taken by another country (in this case, the United States)," the ministry said.

Kremlin spokesman Dmitry Peskov told reporters on a conference call it was Washington's right to file a case to the WTO, but that "in this instance, Russia will, of course, use its full range of counter-arguments."

The exchange comes amid a large-scale trade war between the United States and China, which has seen the world's two biggest economies slap major tit-for-tat duties on each other's imports.

Original url:

<https://www.themoscowtimes.com/2018/08/30/us-goes-to-wto-to-challenge-russian-response-to-trumps-steel-tariffs-a62711>