Lavrov and his Spanish counterpart Josep Borrell said they agreed to establish a joint cybersecurity group to keep the spread of misinformation from damaging bilateral ties, The Associated Press reported Tuesday.

“It seemed to me that our Spanish partners are interested in the idea of establishing a working group on cooperation in ensuring cybersecurity,” Lavrov said following the bilateral talks in Madrid.

Borrell was quoted as saying that he welcomed Lavrov’s proposal in order to “gauge the extent of the problem and analyze it to prevent it from becoming a source of friction.”

Lavrov relayed Borrell’s concerns “that some Russian media go beyond their journalistic mission and are involved in unacceptable interference in domestic electoral processes in other countries.”

“[W]henever we are suspected of anything we suggest discussing professionally the grounds for these accusations at the negotiating table,” he said. “We do not want our relations with Spain, our good friend, to go awry. We want these concerns not to be silenced but to be presented based on specific facts.”

Last year, U.S. President Donald Trump backtracked on plans to create a cybersecurity unit with Russia following talks with President Vladimir Putin.

U.S. intelligence agencies have concluded that Kremlin-backed entities meddled in the 2016 presidential election campaign to try to boost Republican candidate Donald Trump, an accusation Moscow has repeatedly denied. Intelligence officials have said that Moscow remains a threat to U.S. elections.
