

Russia Considers Tightening Alcohol Rules

March 15, 2019

Kirill Zykov / Moskva News Agency

Russia could raise the legal drinking age to 21 from 18 and restrict alcohol sales in residential areas this year, according to the RBC news website.

The change would be part of President Vladimir Putin's ambitious plan to overhaul Russia's economy by the end of his last term in office. The total spend will be $391 billion including almost $26.5 billion in healthcare.

According to proposals debated ahead of an advisory presidential state council meeting planned for April, the increase in the legal drinking age could become effective as early as Dec. 1 2019, and alcohol sales could be restricted in residential areas and restaurants by the same date.

Related article: Kremlin Plans Rapid Healthcare Reform in Time for Presidential Election

Putin set up the advisory council in 2000 based on similar councils used in Soviet and pre-revolutionary times.

Other potential health initiatives include slapping more taxes companies that sell alcohol and tobacco, as well as introducing excise duties on foods with excess sugar and salt.

Employers could also contribute toward fees for staffers' gym memberships, and banks could extend health-related benefits to those who obtain auto insurance, RBC reported.

Original url:

<https://www.themoscowtimes.com/2019/03/15/russia-considers-tightening-alcohol-rules-reports-a648>

23