

Russians Not Under Threat in Sudan Following Military Coup, Embassy Says

April 12, 2019

AP / TASS

Russians traveling in Sudan are not in danger after the ouster of the African nation's longtime leader and ongoing unrest, the Russian Embassy in Khartoum said Thursday.

An estimated 140 Russian citizens are registered as residing in Sudan, where a military coup overthrew President Omar al-Bashir, a close ally of Russia, after 30 years of autocratic rule on Thursday. The U.S. State Department has warned Americans against traveling to Sudan due to "crime, terrorism, civil unrest, kidnapping and armed conflict."

Related article: Russian Lawmakers Criticize Sudan Coup as 'Unconstitutional'

"Despite the declared emergency measures, the situation in the country remains calm. There is no threat to Russian citizens in Sudan," Vladimir Tomsy, the Russian Embassy's press attache, told the state-run RIA Novosti news agency.

Tomsky said the embassy plans to continue its operations amid the unrest, including protests demanding military leaders to hand over power to civilians.

Thousands of Sudanese demonstrators who have been holding almost daily anti-Bashir protests rejected the decision to set up a transitional military council to run the country for two years and vowed to continue protests until a civilian government is established.

Canada shut its embassy doors and urged Canadians to avoid travel to Sudan.

The United States said it was suspending talks with Sudan on normalizing relations and the State Department has ordered non-emergency U.S. government employees to leave the country.

Reuters contributed reporting to this article.

Original url:

<https://www.themoscowtimes.com/2019/04/12/russians-not-under-threat-in-sudan-following-military-coup-embassy-says-a65210>