Instead of being released, however, Malsagov and Chemurziyev have been detained again on suspicion of using force against law enforcement and calling for mass riots, the regional Caucasian Knot news agency reported on Saturday.

Barakhoyev, an Ingush elder and protest leader, had also been detained on suspicion of using violence against law enforcement, the outlet said.

All three had been placed behind bars for two months, the Caucasian Knot reported separately on Sunday.

On Monday, Ingush human rights activist Magomed Mutsolgov said law enforcement officials had surrounded his home and office.

“I guess it’s my turn to experience the brutality of [Ingush governor Yunus-Bek] Yevkurov,” he wrote on Facebook.

Chechnya and Ingushetia signed the controversial border-swap agreement on Sept. 26, 2018. Some estimates have shown that Ingushetia, already Russia’s smallest region, gave up 26 times more territory than Chechnya in the deal.
