Police refused Golunov's request to call his lawyer, Dmitry Dzhulai, as he was being detained, Dzhulai said.

At the police station, Dzhulai said officers dragged Golunov across the floor and at least one punched him in the face and kicked him in the chest. The officers refused to call an ambulance afterward, Meduza reported.

Police also refused to take swabs of Golunov's fingernails and backpack to check if he had touched the alleged substance.

Investigator Igor Lopatin told the BBC Russian service that Golunov was caught selling a club drug called mephedrone.

In a statement Friday, Meduza said Golunov, who investigates corruption at Moscow City Hall and elsewhere, had received threats in recent months in connection to his work.

"We believe Ivan Golunov is innocent," the website said. "Moreover, we have reason to believe that Golunov is being persecuted because of his journalistic activities."

"Meduza will study every action taken by investigators in the Golunov case," the website continued. "We will find out by whose will Vanya is being pursued and we will make this information public."

Russia's Interior Ministry on Friday published nine photos, which were later deleted, that it described as showing narcotic substances found in Golunov's apartment. The ministry denied reports that Golunov had been beaten after his detention. Meduza said only one of the photos was taken at Golunov's apartment and that handwriting shown in the photos doesn't match Golunov's handwriting.

Update: Moscow Mayor Sergei Sobyenin has asked the city's head of police Oleg Baranov to take personal control over Golunov's case and to evaluate the case "as objectively as possible," a spokeswoman for the mayor's office told Interfax.
