

Transneft Sets Cap on Compensation as It Braces for Contamination Claims

Sources say the $15-per-barrel compensation should be at least two times higher.

By Reuters

July 24, 2019

Alexander Nikolayev / Interpress / TASS

Russian oil pipeline monopoly Transneft on Wednesday set a cap of $15 per barrel for compensation stemming from contamination in its network.

The contamination, first discovered in April in Belarus, led to the stoppage of Russian oil exports via the 1 million barrels-per-day Druzhba pipeline and a reduction in oil production in Russia, one of the world's top producers of crude.

Buyers along the Druzhba pipeline to Germany, Poland, Hungary, Slovakia, Ukraine, Belarus and the Czech Republic discovered chemicals in the oil. The Baltic port of Ust-Luga was also affected.

Those purchasers include trading firms and European majors such as Glencore, Trafigura, BP, Eni and Royal Dutch Shell.

Related article: Suspect in Russian Tainted Oil Scandal Seeks Political Asylum in Lithuania

BP and Total declined to comment on Transneft's announcement. Shell did not immediately reply to a request for comment. Total Chief Executive Patrick Pouyanne said in May that his company would seek compensation.

Pouyanne had said the costs of the contamination and eventual decontamination were still to be clarified.

"Who is going to pay for the decontamination? There is a significant amount that is being mentioned, around $15 per barrel. At the moment, everyone is looking at the other to find the one who is responsible," Pouyanne said, answering questions from shareholders in May.

President Vladimir Putin said the contamination had dealt a blow to Russia's reputation as a reliable supplier.

Related article: Russia's Transneft Rebukes Rosneft Over Tainted Oil Crisis

Three market sources familiar with the buyers of Russian oil said the compensation was too low.

"This is not enough to compensate for the costs of contamination," a source said.

Another source with a buyer of Russian oil said the compensation should be at least two times higher than that offered by Transneft.

"This is nonsense. The compensation should be higher and depend on whether the oil was supplied by the pipeline or by sea," he said.

Poland's PKN Orlen said of Transneft's offer: "In connection with the contaminated Russian oil, we incurred certain costs. We continue to estimate them. When we have precise calculations, we will ask suppliers for compensation."

A Polish government official also said Poland may need more flexible oil supply and transmission contracts so it can respond more quickly to potential crises such as the contamination of Russian crude.

Proof required

Transneft said Wednesday that claimants would have to prove they incurred damage from the contamination. Russia has also agreed to pay the same amount of compensation to Kazakhstan.

The company also said in a regulatory statement it had re-appointed Russian Energy Minister Alexander Novak as its board chairman.

Under the compensation scheme, Transneft would pay damages to Russian oil producers, which in turn would compensate the buyers of its oil.

Russian oil producers Rosneft, Gazprom Neft, Russneft and Surgutneftegaz declined immediate comment.

Lukoil referred to an interview in which its chief, Vagit Alekperov, said a discount of not more than $15 per barrel would be fair compensation.

Up to 5 million tons (37 million barrels) of Russian oil for export was found in April to be contaminated with organic chloride, a chemical used to help boost oil extraction but which can damage refining equipment.

Accordingly, the maximum compensation may total around $500 million.

Original url:

<https://www.themoscowtimes.com/2019/07/24/transneft-sets-cap-on-compensation-as-it-braces-for-contamination-claims-a66554>