

The U.S. Imposed New Sanctions Today on Russia. What Are They?

August 26, 2019

Sergei Skripal, Alexander Petrov and Ruslan Boshirov Facebook / Screenshot RT / MT

A new round of U.S. sanctions on Russia over the poisoning of a former spy in Britain last year has gone into effect on Monday.

Washington imposed an initial batch of sanctions last year on Russia after determining that Moscow had used a nerve agent against a former Russian double agent, Sergei Skripal, and his daughter Yulia, in Britain. The Kremlin has repeatedly denied claims that Russia's GRU military intelligence agency poisoned the Skripals in Salisbury in March 2018.

Related article: Russian Finance Minister Says New U.S. Sanctions Won't Hurt Financial System

U.S. President Donald Trump signed the second round of sanctions after Russia failed to provide "reliable assurance" that it would no longer use chemical weapons. The new sanctions will remain in place for at least a year.

What do the new sanctions do?

- Block international financial institutions, such as the World Bank or the International Monetary Fund, from lending or providing any technical or financial assistance to Russia.
- Block U.S. banks from lending to Russia, except for purchasing food or other agricultural products.
- Authorize the U.S. Commerce Department to deny Russia export licenses for chemical and biological goods and technology.

Why were the sanctions imposed?

- The U.S. gave Russia a 90-day deadline in August 2018 to give "reliable assurance" that it would no longer use chemical weapons following the Skripal incident.
- "Russia did not provide the assurances required under U.S. law," the White House said earlier this month. "So we are imposing a second round of sanctions."
- The first round of U.S. sanctions in August 2018 terminated foreign assistance, some arms sales and financing and prohibited security-sensitive goods and technology exports.

Original url:

<https://www.themoscowtimes.com/2019/08/26/the-us-imposed-new-sanctions-today-on-russia-what-are-they-a67014>