

Moscow Mayor Raises Pensions on Eve of Contentious City Election

August 28, 2019

Viktor Drachov / TASS

Moscow's mayor has raised the city's monthly retirement payout less than two weeks before a local election that has triggered the largest sustained protest movement in Russia in recent years.

The protests broke out this summer after election authorities barred a slew of opposition candidates from running for the Moscow City Duma on Sept. 8. Police have briefly detained over 2,000 people, sometimes violently, at rallies that the authorities said were illegal.

Related article: What Appeared to Be a United Opposition During Moscow's Vote Protests Is Fraying — Again

Moscow's minimum pensions will total 19,500 rubles ($300) a month starting in September, Moscow Mayor Sergei Sobyenin announced Tuesday, a week after pledging to increase payouts from the city budget.

Some 1.6 million retirees living in the Russian capital will each receive additional payouts of around 2,000 rubles ($30) next month, Sobyanin tweeted, 44,000 of them for the first time.

Social media users noted that the retirement increase comes suspiciously close to the date of Moscow's election.

Related article: Russian Riot Police Launch Recruitment Drive 'To Suppress Uprisings' in Moscow

“Give us elections twice a year!” one user tweeted in response to Sobyanin's announcement.

Sobyanin, an ally of President Vladimir Putin, has praised the police for what he called their appropriate response to “mass disorder” at the height of the election protests in Moscow.

“We don't live in Zimbabwe,” the mayor said in July, accusing the opposition of “simply forcing the police” to forcibly disperse the protests.

Original url:

<https://www.themoscowtimes.com/2019/08/28/moscow-mayor-raises-pensions-on-eve-of-contentious-city-election-a67052>