

More than 120 Priests Urge Russia to Drop Prosecutions of Moscow Protesters

September 18, 2019

Alexander Avilov / Moskva News Agency

Scores of Russian priests have joined the chorus of voices calling on the authorities to stop the criminal prosecutions of protesters and bystanders following this summer's mass election protests in Moscow.

Around a dozen men, some as young as 21 years old, are being held on various charges after the largest sustained protest movement in Russia since 2011–2013. At least seven of them have been sentenced to prison terms of up to five years, with the conviction of a novice actor triggering widespread public backlash this week.

Related article: Russian Actors Launch Flashmob in Support of Colleague Jailed Over Moscow Protests

“We’re bewildered by the sentences compared with other much milder sentences that the Russian courts handed down to those accused of more serious crimes,” says the open letter signed by 123 priests so far and published on the Orthodoxy and the World website after midnight Wednesday.

The jail sentences “look increasingly like the intimidation of Russian citizens than a fair ruling against the defendants,” the letter says.

“Trials shouldn’t be repressive, courts shouldn’t be used as a means of suppressing dissent and force shouldn’t be used with unjustified cruelty,” said the priests based across Russia, Europe and Hong Kong.

Russian Orthodox Church spokesman Vakhtang Kipshidze on Wednesday dismissed the letter as “pointless.”

Related article: Moscow Protesters Sentenced in ‘New Bolotnaya’ Case

“They should know that political declarations can only be used to fight the authorities and not to change the world based on Christ’s truth. But the church’s mission has never been to fight the authorities,” Kipshidze was quoted as saying to reporters by the state-run TASS news agency.

A group of more than 760 schoolteachers has also penned an open letter calling on the government to drop the Moscow protest cases.

On Tuesday, a working group set up by exiled Kremlin critic and former oil tycoon Mikhail Khodorkovsky published an open letter calling for an end to “political repression and lawlessness” that has been signed by 77 public figures from around the world.

Tens of thousands took to the streets nearly every weekend this summer to demand free elections after several opposition-minded candidates were barred from appearing on the Sept. 8 ballot for the Moscow city legislature.

Police briefly detained more than 2,000 people, handed short jail terms to nearly all of Kremlin critic Alexei Navalny’s entourage and used force to disperse what they said were illegal protests throughout the weeks of demonstrations.

Original url:

<https://www.themoscowtimes.com/2019/09/18/more-than-120-priests-urge-russia-to-drop-prosecution-s-of-moscow-protesters-a67329>