

Putin's Big Spending Push Is Stalled, Hurting His Growth Hopes

By Bloomberg

October 04, 2019

Russia usually underspends in the first half and catches up toward the end of the year. Sergei Vedyashkin / Moskva News Agency

Vladimir Putin, his popularity slipping, wants his government to rev up the economy. But a squeeze on spending by the Finance Ministry so far this year has dragged growth to a near standstill.

Less than 60% of the annual budget had been spent by the end of August, the lowest proportion since before 2012, according to ministry data. Less than a third of the money allocated for this year to Putin's $400 billion multi-year National Projects infrastructure plan had been used by the end of June, Audit Chamber data show.

The funding drought — made worse by revenue that is running above plan — has helped push growth to the slowest in three years.

Related article: Russia Displays a Two-Track Economy

Russia usually underspends in the first half and catches up with a big burst toward the end of the year. But the imbalance this year is worse than usual, in part because officials are being extra cautious about releasing money for the National Projects infrastructure program, given extra Kremlin scrutiny.

“There’s an enormous amount of detail on how to measure each project and what needs to be achieved. That makes implementation difficult,” said Laura Solanko, a Russia expert at the Bank of Finland Institute for Economies in Transition. “The aim is to make sure the money is well spent, but the detail makes it all a very cumbersome process.”

The spending backlog reached 700 billion rubles ($10.8 billion) by the end of August, costing about 1 percentage point of growth in the first half, according to the central bank. In a further drag, some of the unspent funds may need to be pushed into next year to avoid “cramming it into the last four months of 2019,” said Alexey Zabotkin, head of the monetary policy department.

Related article: Russia's Net Public Debt Falls to Zero

Russia ran a budget surplus of 3.7% in the first eight months of the year, the widest since before the global financial crisis in 2008.

Growth this year will be only about 1%, according to the Central Bank, below the government’s 1.3% target and the weakest since 2016. Putin’s National Projects aren’t likely to have much impact until 2020 at the earliest, according to economists.

“The spending this year is unlikely to have a material impact on growth,” said Dmitry Dolgin, chief economist at ING Bank in Moscow. “It will be painful for the economy if we see some structural issues with fulfilling the projects later on.”

Original url:

<https://www.themoscowtimes.com/2019/10/04/putins-big-spending-push-is-stalled-hurting-his-growth-hopes-a67593>