“Five Russian members of the Wagner Group, which is helping the Mozambican government tackle violence in that area of the country, are ... reported to have died,” Carta de Moçambique cited unnamed sources as saying.

Wagner is a private military contractor with reported ties to businessman Yevgeny Prigozhin. Known as “Putin’s chef,” Prigozhin is widely reported to be spearheading Russia’s push to exchange security and electioneering services for mining rights in Africa.

The alleged Sunday afternoon ambush in Mozambique’s northernmost province of Cabo Delgado also killed 20 members of the country’s defense armed forces, Carta de Moçambique reported.

African terrorism expert Jasmine Opperman added, citing emerging reports, that up to three army vehicles were burned in the attack.

The Moscow Times was unable to independently confirm the reports. Neither Russia’s Defense Ministry nor Prigozhin’s company Concord have commented on the news at the time of publication.

The Cabo Delgado insurgency has claimed hundreds of people’s lives since October 2017. The Islamic State terrorist group has claimed involvement in several clashes this year.

Mozambique’s ties to Russia date back to the 1960s, when the Soviet regime supported its Marxist-inspired party against Portugal’s colonial rule. Under a bilateral agreement signed in 2018, Moscow agreed to send military advisers to Mozambique.
