This Wednesday evening at 8:30 p.m. Moscow time (1:30 p.m. in New York, 5:30 p.m. in London) the Voznesensky Cultural Center is hosting an online performance based on the book "Amerikanki" by Zoya Boguslavskaya.

The book, which came out in 1991, was a compendium of Boguslavskaya's essays and descriptions of meetings with a wide variety of American women over the decades, from first ladies Jacqueline Kennedy and Nancy Reagan, to a city worker and prison inmate. The book was a bestseller at the time - a wide-ranging, engaging travelogue written at a time when everything about America and Americans was fascinating to Russian readers. And in writing about Americans, Boguslavskaya also wrote about Russian women, directly or indirectly, and larger issues of freedom, feminism, and change.

The performance is a joint production of the Center and the Russian-American theatrical group led by Yekaterian Smorodina and Andrew Freeburg.

It stars Daria Romyantseva, Anna Nekrasova, Yekaterina Dar, Anna Kalabina, and Jordon Rose Frye, a graduate of the Viktor Ryzhakov Studio.

The performance, which will be in Russian, can be viewed on YouTube here.
