Venediktov made unwanted advances toward Anna Veduta, opposition figure Alexei Navalny's former spokeswoman, after a company dinner in 2012, Veduta told BBC Russia. Veduta, who was in her early 20s at the time, said Venediktov touched her knees against her will inside his car and tried to kiss her outside her home.

"I clung to the seat, shrunk away and said 'No,'" she said.

"I was very ashamed: I had agreed to come to dinner, so I was to blame for what happened," Veduta was quoted as saying. "[Besides,] I really didn't want my foolishness to negatively affect Navalny's relationship with Ekho."

A young social activist whose name was withheld by BBC Russia recounted a similar experience with Venediktov at an August 2017 company dinner.

"We were sitting tightly at the table, I had nowhere to go. Venediktov first started holding my shoulder as if by accident," the anonymous woman was quoted as saying.

"He put his hand on my knee, then his hand moved higher along the inside of my thigh," she said.

Venediktov denied harassing Veduta and dismissed the anonymous account as an attempt to "profit publicly off my name."

Following the publication of BBC Russia's profile, Navalny said he was unaware of the incident involving Veduta, tweeting his "deep support" for her Wednesday.

"I believe that Alexei Venediktov should apologize regardless of his attitude toward the situation," Navalny said.

Venediktov apparently stopped relishing his image as an "alcoholic and womanizer" after a slew of sexual harassment accusations against his friend and federal lawmaker Leonid Slutsky emerged in 2018, BBC Russia reported.

Ekho Moskvyy was among half a dozen news outlets that boycotted Russia's lower house of parliament after its ethics commission dismissed the accusations against Slutsky.

"I had met him [Slutsky] at a Foreign Ministry reception and told him 'You're an a--hole'," BBC Russia quoted Venediktov as saying.

"You should have said: 'Even if you imagined it [the sexual harassment accusations], I apologize.' Instead, you're starting to scoff. I won't talk to you until you apologize."
