

Russian Oligarch Has $1.5Bln in Foreign Assets Frozen Due to Sanctions

February 01, 2021

Viktor Vekselberg had extensive ties in the West before he was sanctioned in 2018. Kremlin.ru

Russian metals tycoon Viktor Vekselberg has had more than $1.5 billion worth of foreign assets frozen as a result of U.S. sanctions, he told Forbes magazine.

Owner of the commodities and communications conglomerate Renova Group, Vekselberg was placed under U.S. sanctions in April 2018, as part of Washington's response to Russia's "malign activity" — the annexation of Crimea, involvement in Eastern Ukraine and alleged interference in the 2016 U.S. Presidential Election.

The sanctions froze the assets of many wealthy Russians, who the U.S. alleges is close to the Kremlin, and generally prohibit Western businesses and individuals from working with them.

Related article: Navalny Supporters Abroad Urge West to Get Serious About Sanctions

Vekselberg has been linked with Russia's courting of former U.S. president Donald Trump ahead of the 2016 election. He attended Trump's swearing in ceremony, Bloomberg reported, and boasted to Russian officials about his closeness to the U.S. administration and ability to sway sanctions policy.

In an interview with Forbes Russia, Vekselberg said he had "more than" $1.5 billion held up in overseas assets that he can no longer access without written permission from the U.S. Treasury Department. Most of the assets are believed to be shares of companies located in Switzerland. Various media reports citing anonymous sources "close to" the billionaire had previously estimated his losses at $1-2 billion from the imposition of sanctions.

Vekselberg is worth more than $16 billion according to the Bloomberg Billionaires Index. Alongside his business interests, Vekselberg is also behind a number of education and cultural projects backed by the Russian government, including the Skolkovo technology cluster — Russia's attempt to develop a Silicon Valley-like ecosystem in Moscow's suburbs, favored by former President Dmitry Medvedev.

Vekselberg has been outspoken in hitting out against U.S. sanctions. He told Forbes: "Many of my ideas about the world had to be changed. I always believed that I understood the Western world ... Therefore the sanctions were a shock."

He added that he has submitted written requests to both the U.S. Treasury and the European Commission to try and access the funds, which have been rejected.

The use of personal sanctions against Russian business figures has been thrust back into the spotlight in recent weeks, with calls for the West to levy new punishments against the Kremlin in response to the poisoning and arrest of leading Kremlin critic Alexei Navalny.

Original url:

<https://www.themoscowtimes.com/2021/02/01/russian-oligarch-has-15bln-in-foreign-assets-frozen-due-to-sanctions-a72792>